FRIENDLESS IN LONDON Experience of a Yankee Lad Who Went Over in a Cattle Ship. London is the Mecca of aspiring pov-erty; like Oliver Twist, the forlorn but hopeful mortal bends his thoughts towards that whirlpool where identity is lost in the excitement of activity and the glamor of possibility. Those who come within the rirele seldom reappear. How beautiful the hopficids of Kent seem in memory, how infinitely peaceful the far-away lines of the Devon coast. These thoughts came later to a young man who had worked his passage from America on a cattle ship, and was eager to forget the misery of the voyage in any sort of work that might be found in the great, busy center of human activity. The mist hung low and clammy as he passed over the cinder paths of Deptford. "Is this the way to London?" he asked a laborer. "Ay, my lad, you're a Yankee ben't you?" Ten miles is a long distance for a hungry man to travel on foot; he looked longingly at the crowded frams that rattled past him and he jingled the two silver dollars in his pocket. He learned later that he might have ridden the whole way in a workingman's omnibus

It was 6 o'clock, and as he came into the outskirts of the city, the light of the long rows of open-air booths, crowded with vegetables, meats, pastry, and all manner of edibles, served to accentuate his feeling of faintness. He went into a money hanger's whop and bartered his two coins for seven shillings sixpence and bought a cup of chocolate and a Bath bun. ch took the keen edge from his hunger.

He tolled on for two weary hours through the fog, which destroyed everything. Some of the cattle besses had recommended a boarding house to him and dilated at length on its charms, and by $130 he saw Gardiner's Scoten House had not much farther to go. A short distance beyond it Commercial branches off from Commercial road, and the Victoria Home, No. 1, for workingmen, stands near the corner of that street and the famous Petticoat Lane.

It was not a nice locality; it reminded him more of the east side in New York than anything he had so far seen; drunken men and women were abundant, and ragged children carrying pails of beer were jostled about by the pedestrians, out to the people camped in the outskirts The old and smoky corner building to which he was directed impressed him ! gloomily, and slouchy men slunk into the basement through a low doorway.
